Introduction

At this writing nine candidates had announced their intent to be elected Texas Governor in November 2010. Just three contestants in this exorbitant slugfest reported holding more than $30,000 in the bank by the end of June. In fact, the race's two Republican frontrunners each boasted war chests more than 20 times larger than the best-funded candidate running as a Democrat: Tom Schieffer.¹ So far, there has been little contest apart from the multi-million-dollar GOP rivalry between Governor Rick Perry and U.S. Senator Kay Bailey Hutchison. This report focuses on the money raised by Perry and Hutchison because, to date, that's where the money is. Time remains to dissect other candidates' finances if and when they break into the big leagues.

Gubernatorial Campaign Finance Facts

*Includes almost $8 million transferred from Hutchison's federal campaign.

The fundraising timetables analyzed here are not the same for Governor Perry and Senator Hutchison, despite the fact that both were last reelected in 2006. The longest-serving governor in Texas history, Perry has been raising and spending gubernatorial campaign cash for a decade. The only meaningful interruption for his fundraising machine has been the state law that bars lawmakers and top officials from raising money for a six-month period surrounding biennial legislative sessions.² This report analyzes the money Perry raised after closing the books on his 2006 reelection campaign. Specifically, it covers the $14,431,275 that Perry raised from January 1, 2007 through his last reported contributions dated July 2, 2009.³

By contrast, Senator Hutchison did not appoint a state campaign treasurer until December 4, 2008.⁴ Ostensibly, this report focuses on the $14,861,847 that Hutchison's state campaign raised from that time through July 2, 2009. Yet this is just half of Hutchison's campaign-finance story. Last December her Senate committee transferred $7,961,645 in federal campaign dollars to Hutchison's new state committee. Because these federal funds account for 54 percent of the money that Hutchison's state campaign has reported to date, researchers asked the Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics to analyze contributions to Senator Hutchison's federal war chest. That analysis appears at the end of this report.

Thanks in large part to her Senate largesse, Hutchison's state campaign had $12.5 million left in the bank at the end of June—surpassing Governor Perry's $9.3 million. In addition, Hutchison's federal senate campaign, which raised almost $13,000 in the first half of 2009, had $770,372 in the bank at the end of June. Hutchison's federal leadership committee, KPAC, had $200,947 in the bank at the end of June. These arsenals remain at Hutchison's disposal.

Perry and Hutchison still were not on equal footing when they both were up and running in the first half of 2009. Hutchison raised money freely in this period while the governor was subject to a session-related fundraising ban until the last days of June. Yet this ban did not bar the governor from rallying supporters to give when his legal fundraising window reopened, which they did. In the last eight days of June, the governor raked in $4.2 million—closing the gap on the $6.7 million that Hutchison raised in the first half of 2009.⁵

Funding By Check Size

Texas infamously imposes no limits on how much money individuals or political committees can contribute to candidates for the state's legislative and executive branch. During 16 years in the U.S. Senate, Hutchison was subject to federal campaign limits (currently prohibiting individuals from giving federal candidates more than $2,400 per election).⁶ More recently, Hutchison's state campaign has embraced Texas' wild-West system, taking $100,000 checks from six Texas tycoons.⁷

Total Amount Raised By Check Size

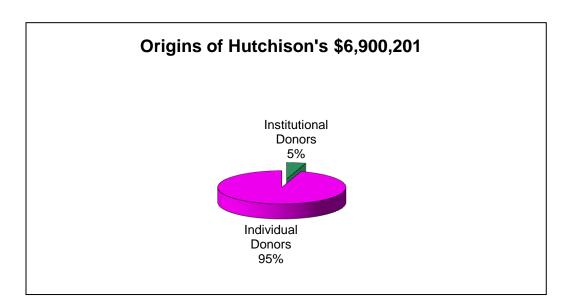

Perry is even more dependent on large-denomination donations. He amassed 60 percent of his money from checks worth $25,000 or more. These whopper checks accounted for 34 percent of the money that Hutchison raised from sources other than her federal campaign.⁹ At the other end of the spectrum, checks of less than $1,000 accounted for 12 percent of Hutchison's money and just 3 percent of Perry's total. Overall, Hutchison had a wider fundraising base. Putting aside her federal funds, she collected more than 8,000 checks totaling $6.9 million. Perry relied on fewer than 6,000 checks to raise more than twice as much money.¹⁰

Individual v. Institutional Funds

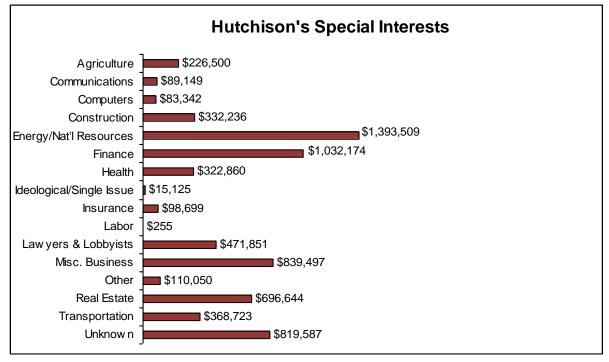

Governor Perry relied more on institutional donors such as political committees and businesses (18 percent of his total) than Hutchison (5 percent). The average institutional contribution to Perry was $6,273, or almost five times the average institutional contribution to Hutchison ($1,271). Perry's average individual contribution of $1,559 was almost twice Hutchison's average individual contribution of $847.

Funding By Interest Category

The top three industries funding Governor Perry also were the leading bankrollers of Senator Hutchison's state campaign. The industry groups with the biggest investments in these campaigns were: 1. Energy & Natural Resources; 2. Finance and 3. Miscellaneous Business (the top-contributor lists for Perry and Hutchison identify the big guns from these industries). See the last section for an industry analysis of Hutchison's federal funds.

Special-Interest Percentages

Note that Hutchison—who championed the oil and gas industry in Congress—is even more dependent on the Energy & Natural Resources sector (20 percent of her total) than Perry (16 percent). Tracking nine key oil-industry votes since 2005, Washington-based Oil Change International found that Texas' two senators voted the oil industry's position every time.¹¹

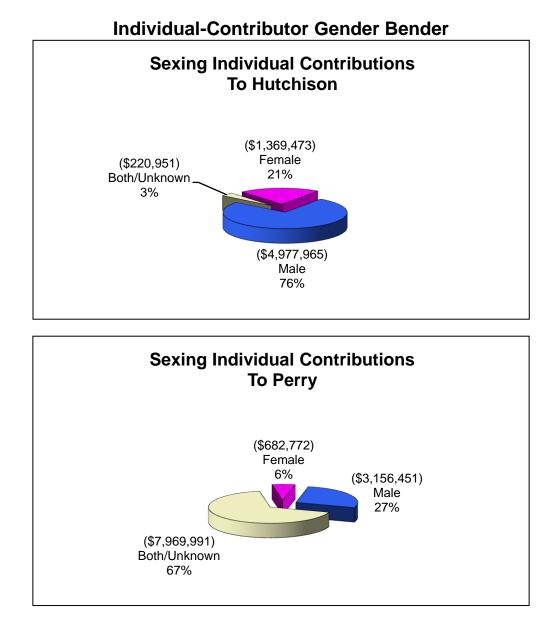

Hutchison's next bastion of support comes from Real Estate and Lawyers & Lobbyists. Perry turned next to Construction and Transportation—backers of his troubled Trans-Texas Corridor scheme. He also received relatively more support from the Health, Communications and Insurance industries.

Researchers failed to identify interest categories for 12 percent of Hutchison's funds, notably more than the 3 percent of Perry's money classified as "Unknown." Hutchison's donors proved harder to identify for several reasons. As previously discussed, she relies more on smaller-denomination contributors, who are harder to identify. Hutchison also raised almost five percent of her money from contributors identified as "homemaker" or "housewife" (such donors supplied one-tenth of one percent of Perry's funds). Identifying the interests of breadwinners in these households is more challenging.

Funding By Gender

Does this "homemaker" disparity suggest that Hutchison received a larger share of her funds from female contributors? To parse a possible gender gap, researchers divided individual contributors into those with masculine first names, feminine first names and first names of indeterminate gender.¹² Unlike Hutchison, Governor Perry also provided gender cues in the form of courtesy titles such as "Mr.," "Mrs." and "Ms."

In fact, most of Perry's individual money could not be gender segregated due to his heavy use of dual-sex titles such as "Mr. and Mrs. Harold Simmons." In the end, women accounted for 21 percent of the money that Hutchison raised from individuals and just 6 percent of Perry's individual funding.¹³ Putting aside her federal funds, Hutchison's state committee raised about half as much money as Perry. Nonetheless, in absolute terms she raised twice as many dollars from women donors.

Top States

A fable central to Perry's primary reelection pitch depicts the governor donning a white Stetson to defend a beneficent state government from the wicked witch of Washington. Campaign-finance geography does not provide strong support for this story line (the last section analyzes contributions to Hutchison's Dallas-based Senate committee).

Hutchison's state campaign raised 2 percent of its money outside Texas, considerably less than the 8 percent of Perry's money that came from other states. While the beltway areas of Washington and Virginia were lucrative sources of Hutchison's out-of-state funding, Washington, D.C. accounted for almost one-half of one percent of the money raised by both Hutchison and Perry. The favorite foreign watering holes of the secessionist-leaning Governor Perry were New York and California.

Top Cities

Seven Texas cities made the top-10 fundraising lists for both Hutchison and Perry. Only Perry's top-10 list also includes New York, Midland and Bryan, while just Fort Worth, Temple and San Angelo made that cut for Hutchison. Both candidates leaned on their top-10 cities for more than 70 percent of the money in their war chests.

Top Zip Codes

Hutchison traces 28 percent of her money to just five zip codes and five postal codes account for 20 percent of Perry's funds. Two Houston zip codes richly financed both campaigns. Hutchison's home base in the DFW Metroplex accounted for three of her most fertile postal codes. Perry's Austin base supplied two of his richest zip codes. The habitat of Austin's powerful lobby, 78701, supplied eight percent of the governor's funds.

The next two charts list top campaign contributors to Hutchison and Perry. Hutchison got almost $2.1 million from her top 32 donors listed below (30 percent of the money that she raised from sources other than her federal war chest). Perry got almost $4.5 million from his top 34 donors listed below (31 percent of his total haul). Texas' next governor will be heavily indebted to deep-pocket contributors such as these.

Contributors To Both Candidates

Some contributors gave to the campaigns of both Perry and Hutchison. The next chart lists 38 contributors who have distributed at least $15,000 between both of these Republican candidates. Some gave more to the incumbent, others favored the challenger and a few split their money down the middle. Notably, just 10 of the 38 dual contributors gave to Governor Perry after Hutchison established her state campaign committee on December 4, 2008.

Top Contributors To State Campaigns of Hutchison and Perry

Note: Covers Dec. 4, 2008 through July 2, 2009 for Hutchison; Jan. 1, 2007 through July 2, 2009 for Perry. *Donor gave to Perry after Hutchison formed her state political committee on Dec. 4, 2008.

Hutchison's Federal Funds

Senator Hutchison's state campaign got 54 percent of the $14.9 million that it raised from December 4, 2008 through July 2, 2009 from Hutchison's federal campaign committee. Given the role of these federal funds in Hutchison's state campaign, Texans for Public Justice asked the Washington-based Center for Responsive Politics (CRP) to analyze the $1,635,715 in contributions that Hutchison's federal campaign raised from January 1, 2007 through June 30, 2009¹⁴ (virtually the same period analyzed above for Perry's campaign).¹⁵ In a December 2008 spending spree, Hutchison's federal campaign wrote three checks totaling $7,961,645 to a new Texas committee: Texans for Kay Bailey Hutchison.¹⁶

Dissecting the almost $1.7 million that Hutchison's federal campaign raised in this period, CRP found that individuals contributed 87 percent of this money and political committees contributed 13 percent.¹⁷ Checks of less than $200 accounted for $194,839 of Hutchison's federal funds, or 12 percent of the total. Federal candidates do not itemize detailed information for such small contributors. As a result, CRP could not analyze that portion of Hutchison's funds in the analysis below.

Texas accounted for 84 percent of Hutchison's itemized federal funds, with the Washington beltway areas of DC and Virginia accounting for another 8 percent.¹⁸ New York and California rounded out the list of the most lucrative states for Hutchison's federal campaign. In the list of Hutchison's top federal contributors below, two-thirds of them hail from Texas.

Top States For Federal Funds

CRP was unable to identify the interests associated with 19 percent of Hutchison's itemized federal contributions. It found that Hutchison's top sectors were the Other category (12 percent), Energy & Natural Resources (10 percent) and Health (8 percent). The Other category includes retirees, civil servants, military, non-profits and educational institutions.

NOTES

² Texas' regular legislative sessions meet during the first five months of odd-numbered years.

⁵ Perry spent $1.3 million in campaign funds during the first six months of 2009, while Hutchison spent almost $1.9 million.

⁶ Political committees cannot give more than $5,000 to a federal candidate in each election. Note that the primary and general constitute separate elections for this purpose. As such, contributors who maxed out in the primary can give to the same candidate again if he or she advances to the general election.

⁸ Excludes $7,961,645 from Hutchison's federal campaign.

⁹ Again. Hutchison raised her U.S. Senate campaign money under federal rules that cap individual contributions at no more than $2,400 per election.

¹⁰ This analysis looks at individual checks. Aggregating checks from contributors who gave a total of $1,000 or more, 1,326 major donors gave Hutchison $6,136,300 (89 percent of her total). Perry received $13,975,839 (97 percent of his total) from 1,285 major donors.

¹² Causes of indeterminate gender include the use of first-name initials and gender-ambiguous first names such as "Pat." This method is further complicated in a region where some hard-ass fathers name their sons "Sue." Researchers admittedly spent more time trying to sex big contributors. Apparently, size matters.

¹³ Women accounted for 51 percent of the overall Texas electorate in November 2006, when Perry and Hutchison were last elected, according to CNN exit polls. In the 2008 general election, women accounted for 53 percent of the Texas electorate (Republican John McCain won 52 percent of Texas' female vote and 59 percent of its male vote). Women cast 49 percent of the ballots cast in the 2008 Republican primary, CNN exit polls found.

¹⁶ Transfers to Hutchison's state campaign account for most of the $8,949,228 that Hutchison's federal campaign spent in this period. Note that Hutchison also has maintained a federal leadership committee: KPAC. It raised and spent approximately $1.1 million from 2005 through June 2009 but did not contribute to Hutchison's state committee. KPAC had $200,947 in the bank at the end of June 2009.

¹⁷ Again, these contributors were subject to federal rules that cap individual donors at $2,400 per election and political committees at $5,000. ¹⁸ Hutchison received $6,800 from the beltway state of Maryland (0.5 percent).
